Example A database consists of a collection of documents (or objects) that describe real-world objects, and a collection of queries over those documents (or objects). A query answers the question: "For which documents do I want to perform?". The documents are represented by their contents, and the queries by their conditions. For example, is a query that answers the question: "For which documents do I want to add 'Mice' to the list of animals they are studying?". A query is convex if its answer does not change if we add (as a condition) another document that has the same content as the query document, and is disjoint from the query document. For example, is a convex query, for it answers the same for both documents, and does not change for either one. , , , , That is, it is convex, for,,, and. If a query is convex, it is said to be a convex database, and as well as the documents and the queries, the database also contains a convex decomposition that defines the database by the queries (and/or documents) in the database. For example, the above document-query database can be defined by decomposing into which is the convex database. The queries that belong to the same convex decomposition are called convex queries as well. In this example the two queries are equal and so both are convex. The database has two convex queries, one for each document. The queries are the same for all the documents, so they form a convex database. A sequence of queries or a pair of queries (hereafter called a query) is an embedding of a sequence into the database, if it answers the same queries as the sequence. For example, 1cdb36666d
